SATURDAY MORNING, JULY 9, 1859.

THE JAPANESE PRIZE RING. No spectacle in Japan is complete or even possible, in which both spectators and performers do not make several changes of costume. On the stage this is a matter of course with actors and actresses, but it is also extended to the audience. Ladies who go to the play are accompanied by numerous servants and a magnificent wardrobe; and in the course of the spectacle, which begins in the morning and ends late at night, they retire several times, and when they return, it is in new and gorgeous attire.

The wrestlers are dressed and led out for show, and then they are undressed again; and a space being prepared, and a ring formed they are divided into two opposing parties. These two parties stand in the ring glaring at one another; then they tramp heavily backward and forward so as to show their points, and enable spectators to make up their betting books.

After this they retire, and all, with the exception of two, are again clothed in full dress, and take up their position on the front seats round the ring. The two who have been reserved now come forward, with the simple cloth bound round their loins, and walk with slow and deliberate steps into the centre of the ring. They stand eyeing each other with a wary look, glaring with a brutal ferocity, each watching a chance to catch his autagonist of his guard. And as a savage nature comes more and more to the surface, they assume the look and even the movements of two wild fierce bulls.

As they continue to eye each other, they stamp heavily on the ground, pawing the earth, as it were, with impatience, and then they stoop, grasp handfuls of earth, and fling it with an angry toss over their backs. They crouch down low, still keeping their eyes fixed one on the other, and watching each movement; then in a moment there is a sudden spring, a great shock as the massive frames strike each other, a rebound, and then the two monsters become one monster, with many limbs heaving and struggling. with great muscles rising in distinct outline, with bloated faces, and gushes of purple

Prize-fighting in Japan is very much like prize-fighting in England. But perhaps in Japan they recognize the nature of the ex-hibition more truly than we do, and it is by J. R. PIERPOINT. hibition more truly than we do, and it is quite in character with the rest of the scene, and a legitimate demonstration, when the next antagonist lowers his head, and rushes at his opponent, bellowing like a bull. Let us leave the wrestlers, they will all struggle in succession, and with a like result, and then the man who can give and take most, will stand panting and victorious, and will be led off in triumph. The spectators meanwhile, instead of talking slang and looking disreputable, like the frequenters, of English prize-fights, will go home to music, and poetry, and water parties.

Perhaps in the evening of the same day we shall find them in the company of ladies, sitting by a cool running stream or in a shady grove, each with a book. The book may be of poetry, or containing religious and moral apophthegms. -- Household Words.

A SHIP ON ROLLERS.

"Wonders will never cease" while this earth revolves on its airy axis, and apropos to this we must also conclude that "all fools are not dead yet." Of this we are certain from the description of a new steamer described in our cotemporary, the London Engineer, proposed by J. A. Novello, of London, for navigating the ocean at the astonishing speed of fifty miles per hour. He is to accomplish this feat by placing his ship on revolving cylinders, which are to answer the same purpose on water that wheels do in railway Excelsior do.; and Zinc Lead, received and for carriages on land. By such a method of sale by [jy 6] H. COOK & CO. carriages on land. By such a method of sale by constructing his vessel, he expects to be rolsame amount of resistance which all wedge by shaped vessels encounter. Such a proposition is based upon erroneous views of the resistance of water to bodies passing through it .-This resistance is in proportion to the submerged surface, and as cylinders or rollers in a vessel must present a greater extent of surface than the hulls of vessels as at present formed, of course, instead of increasing their speed, they will thereby have their speed greatly reduced. Wheels on a vehicle to be drawn or pushed through a soft element like water or snow, are more injurious than beneficial. Just think of placing a winter sleigh on wheels!-- Scientific American.
